Text 正文

[*17] One objective of both farmers and their communities that remains consistent over the years is improving local economic conditions. In order to accomplish this, the agricultural industry has witnessed a changing form of business organizational structure over the past couple decades. 1 Once popular agricultural cooperatives are facing challenges in today's commercialized world. 2 As a result of these challenges, the business entities are looking for different organizational structures in order to reap much needed legal and financial benefits. 3 In the case of ethanol plants, many entities, namely traditional farmer cooperatives, are forming limited liability companies. 4

A modern ethanol plant costs an average of $ 50 to $ 100 million to build. Traditional cooperatives would require this funding to be raised by farmer-owners alone, which proves to be an often unbearable burden. 5 Limited liability companies allow the farmer-members of a cooperative to be involved in the ethanol plant, but provide opportunities for outside investment from non-farmers and permit [*18] applicable partnership tax rates. 6 This shift by ethanol plants structured as cooperatives to LLCs affects not only the farmers and investors involved, but also but also the communities in which they are located and the nation's economy as a whole. 7

Arguments have been made that illustrate the benefits of both forms of business structures. Cooperatives benefit the local community, and continue the cooperative tradition of operating for "mutual benefit." While the rationale seems ideal, operating under this organizational structure is just not possible for many ethanol plants. The financial benefits of an LLC often outweigh the principle considerations of operating as a cooperative, and in many cases usage of the LLC organizational form is the only way to build and operate an ethanol plant. Generally, the purpose of this Article is to provide a basic understanding of the changing business organizational structure trend from traditional agricultural cooperatives to LLCs. This Article will explain the comparative differences between agricultural cooperatives and LLCs. This Article will then examine the ethanol industry, and illustrate the requirements for building an ethanol plant. Also, this Article will provide examples of new ethanol plants and those currently being built under this new LLC business form. Finally, this Article will describe the effects of the changed
